Our secondary sources helped us understand the background of our topic and led us to more sources, including primary sources. The Internet site QC Varsity helped give us information on other states' basketball programs besides Iowa. The best secondary source was the book The Only Dance in Iowa, a book on Iowa girls' basketball, then and now. It helped with our research just as much as our primary sources by showing both sides of the story.

Our secondary sources were used to give us background information and occasionally for specific information. We mostly used the internet for our secondary sources but also included some books. Some examples of our secondary sources include the Voyager Program's webpage and Timothy Ferris' "Onward Voyagers." We also used our secondary sources to get most of the pictures for our exhibit. With this secondary research, we learned background information about the Voyagers, which eventually led us to our specific topic and primary sources.

In my research, I used several secondary sources. My most useful sources were two online magazine articles that included information about Bertha Holt leading the international adoption movement. I used other websites to gain information about the Holt story and about how international adoption has changed. I also found several of my pictures on internet sites.

I found several secondary sources, which helped me understand Tesla's life. I also learned that Tesla once worked for Edison, but quit after Edison lied about a reward. My most important secondary source is the "Edison vs Tesla" article, because I got to know some important facts of the Tesla and Edison battles. I used my secondary sources for information for my board.

I used several websites and photographs I found online as secondary sources. One website helped me learn about the background of the transcontinental railroad, an important factor in promoting tourism at the canyon. I also watched several online documentaries from PBS, including one showing the details of the Kolb Brothers' daily routine, which included photographing and developing prints of tourists. As another secondary resource, I emailed Richard Quartaroli, a Kolb Brothers and Grand Canyon expert, and Jim Quarnstrom, who has river-rafted on several rivers in Idaho.

We found many secondary sources including websites, images, and informational newspaper articles. Two of the secondary websites were used in our timeline page, and helped us display a condensed version of the history of autism. One of the other websites was about autism researcher Leo Kanner, and the other was about the way the treatments for autism evolved and changed throughout history. We used multiple images in our website, most of which were secondary. The newspaper articles were both about the treatments for autism, and gave good examples of the way treatments evolved and changed throughout history.
